HALCYON

"The student today — whatever his faults — is not the 'college kid' our parents so glibly expect us to be . . . It is not that the student will not behave in the old 'laugh a minute' style. He certainly will, especially as we give him nothing else to do. But this behavior is only a surface phenomenon. Man's life is lived inside his head, in the consciousness which is the primal fact of human existence. What is seen outside is only a smoke screen, more or less effective, behind which life is lived. So when we observe the behavior which preserves the image of the 'college kid', the riotous search for 'enjoyment' enshrined forever by a movie like 'Where the Boys Are' — the whole 'fun and gaiety' motif of the descent on Fort Lauderdale, we must look a little deeper. . . .

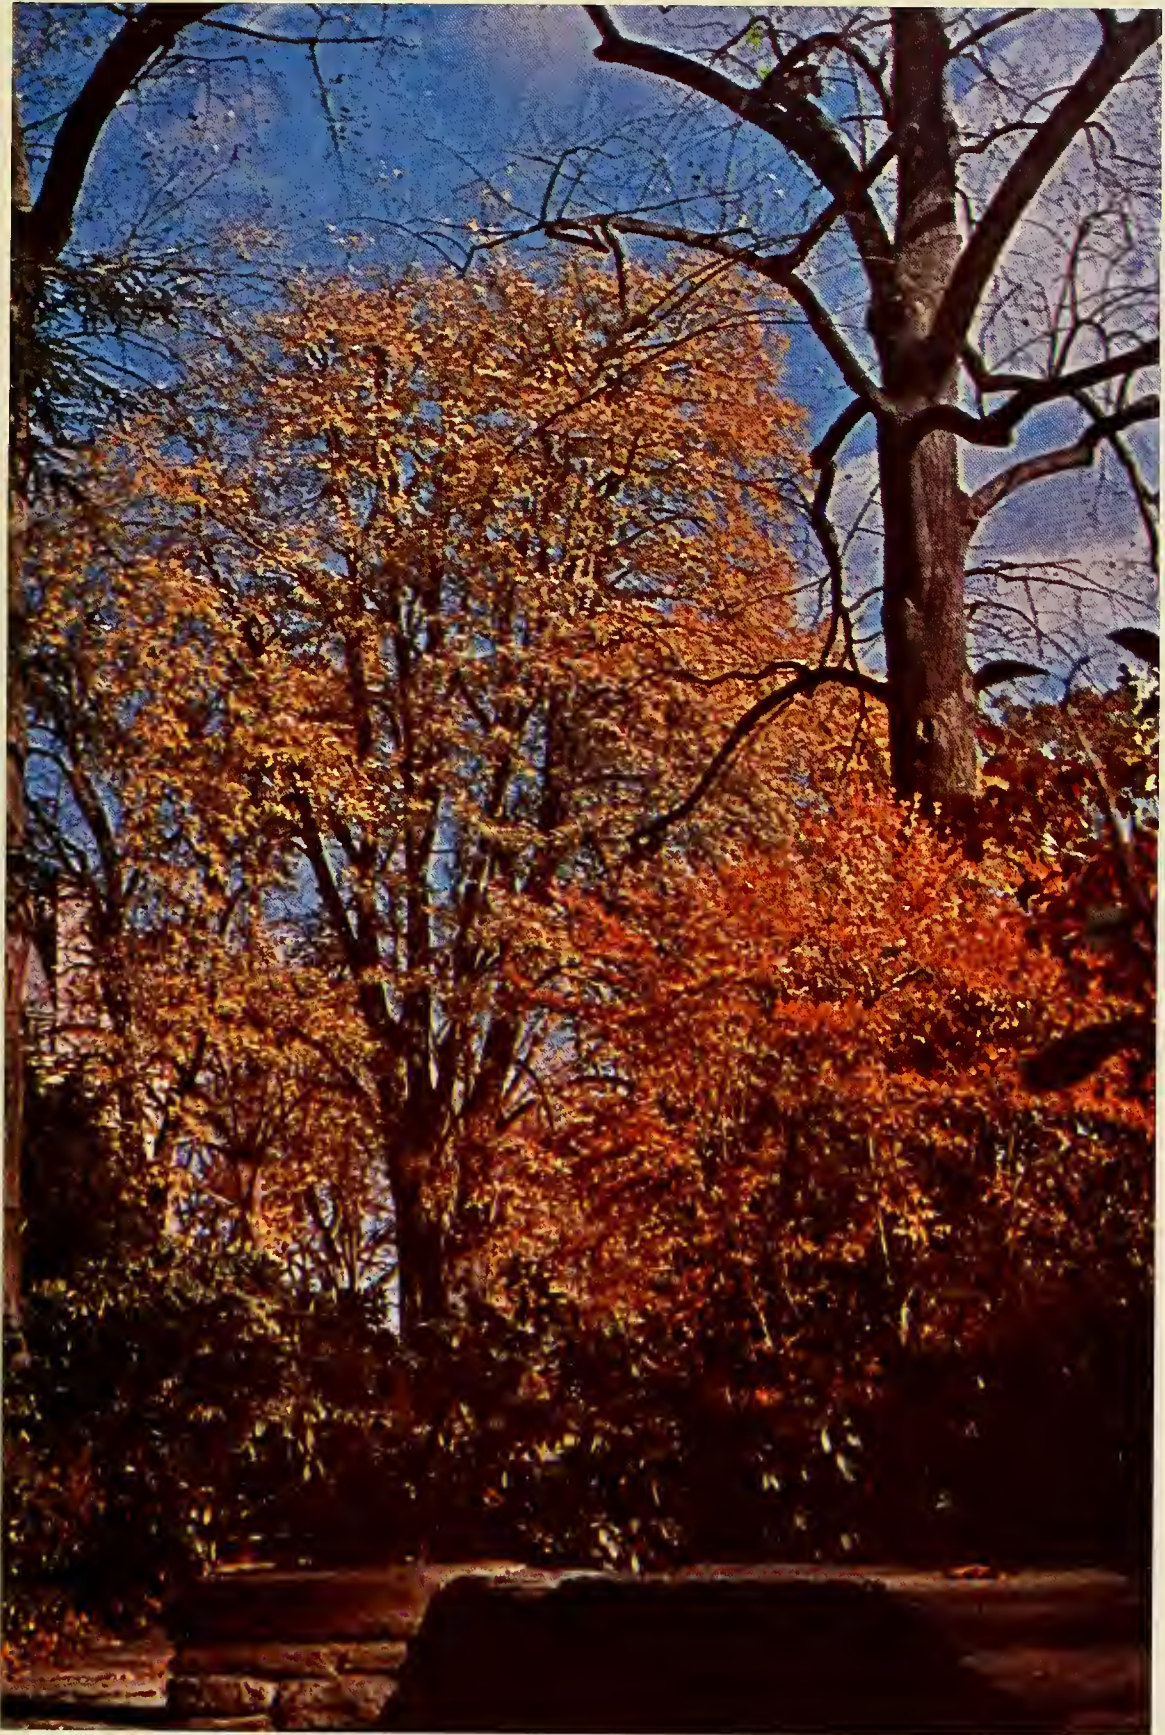

The student today is a new animal in a new age. A few generations ago, young men and women looked forward to a life dominated by the effort to work and save, to provide for future generations and for old age; it was a time when satisfactions and relaxations were all put aside for some undefined future, which, if it arrived at all, arrived too late. These were the people who arrived at old age and success with the sense of being cheated, as Nathanael West realized so well — with 'fevered minds' built by years of expecting and imagining and with 'emaciated bodies' no longer able to support the constructs of the mind. That such men should have had a gospel of destruction should be no surprise. And that it should have been essential that, as young men, as college students, they should have needed some time — a moratorium on life — to enjoy themselves before commencing that road, there should be no surprise. This generation of students differs. It has never had to wait; it has grown in the most unparalleled prosperity in the history of the country. It has no need to delay. It has no need to worry about its future employment, about its next meal, about 'providing.' And, moreover, our parents have learned the lesson of the past: that one can delay and wait too long. But human life has a tendency to run to extremes. From West's men who waited and delayed and expected too long — the men of 'fevered minds and emaciated bodies', has sprung a generation of students with 'fevered bodies and emaciated minds'. This is a generation which has been dominated by the urge to flee from all the older concepts which were thought to make a man — obligation, responsibility, honor, and, if you will, sacrifice. . . .

The process of making students citizens — of broadening their lives beyond the narrow circle of family and 'success ethics' — of giving them the ability to feel responsibility and guilt — of allowing them to develop a sense of identity — all of that would be a long slow task. But it is the absolutely vital task. . . . In fact, the process might not work at all. You might be unsuccessful. But you must be willing to take that risk if you are to lead others to do so. You must have that true radicalism that does not care if it fails to change the world, but is more concerned with preventing the world from changing it — more concerned to be true to its own ideas of virtue and responsibility. . . .

. . . what we must restore to the student of America is the sense and the vision that Frost put so well —

'The woods are lovely, dark and deep
But I have promises to keep
And miles to go before I sleep
And miles to go before I sleep.'

The question is often asked at Swarthmore, what is the value of athletics? Is there a place on a predominantly intellectual campus for the cheers, the spirit, the pep rallies, all of which are associated with sports? The answer would seem to be by all odds an emphatic yes. When played in the context that they are at Swarthmore, athletics can indeed be of great value.

First of all, and most basically, they are important to the players themselves. In the same way that acting in a play or writing for the Phoenix is enjoyable to some people, participation in sports is enjoyable to others. It provides an outlet for energy and at the same time allows for development of the student's physical abilities. Excellence in athletics comes, as it does in most other fields, only after hard work and determined effort. The athlete learns to value self-discipline, determination, and honest effort, for without them, he cannot possibly succeed at his task of striving for excellence. Athletics also gives the player an opportunity to learn something about himself. He learns of his own capabilities and shortcomings. He learns the value of teamwork and cooperation. If he plays only for himself he feels the censure from his fellows just as soon as the "ham" feels it from his fellow actors on the stage. Furthermore, the mere contact with other people, the desire to win within the context of good sportsmanship, the give and take necessary in any kind of team endeavor, all contribute in their way to building the various qualities that together are called character.

Thus the value of athletics, at least at Swarthmore, is evident. And as the former General Secretary of the Rhodes Scholarship Trust once said, "Playing hard and well need not be the enemy, and is more often the ally, of working hard and well."

This day writhes with what? The lecturer
On This Beautiful World of Ours composes himself
And hems the planet rose and hews it ripe,

And red, and right. The particular question — here
The particular answer to the particular question
Is not in point — the question is in point.

If the day writhes, it is not with revelations.
One goes on asking questions. That, then, is one
Of the categories. So said, this placid space

Is changed. It is not so blue as we thought. To be blue,
There must be no questions. It is an intellect
Of windings round and dodges to and fro,

Writhings in wrong obliques and distances,
Not an intellect in which we are fleet: present
Everywhere in space at once, cloud-pole

Of communication. It would be enough
If we were ever, just once, at the middle, fixed
In This Beautiful World of Ours and not as now,

Helplessly at the edge, enough to be
Complete, because at the middle, if only in sense,
And in that enormous sense, merely enjoy.

WHEN YOU NEED SPECIAL FASTENERS—

Here are 4 good reasons for getting them from SPS

Service you can depend on. Where socket-type specials are concerned—from extreme configurations to near-standards—you can rely on SPS for prompt quotations, strict quality control during manufacture, and delivery on schedule. The special fasteners you need will be on your assembly line in time . . . and they will fit with precision.

Experience. No one has invested more in fastener research and development than SPS. No one has pioneered more breakthroughs—in design (UNBRAKO Hi-Life Thread), performance (first commercial 260,000 psi bolt), or materials (first practical titanium bolt). Because of this experience we are singularly qualified to meet any requirement you may have in precision specials.

Design confirmation. SPS does more than simply meet specifications. Our engineering and methods people not only interpret your prints; they also analyze them—carefully. If there is a question (socket depth, fillet radius, etc.), we double check with you. Certainly no one knows all the answers, but sometimes we can offer a suggestion that may help increase fastening reliability and thus increase overall reliability of your finished product.

Production facilities second to none. Whatever your requirement in specials, SPS has the facilities to produce it in the quickest, most economical manner. Special configuration, special material, special threads (metric, for example), special plating or surface treatment, special tolerances—we are handling such problems daily on a volume basis. Further, we also supply the special keys needed for installation of non-standard or difficult-to-reach threaded parts.

For more information or service, see your local SPS distributor or contact Standard Pressed Steel Co., SPECIAL INDUSTRIAL FASTENER Division, SPS, JENKINTOWN 37, PA.
